

Home Missions Council (1912-1950)
Council of Women for Home Missions
Home Missions Council of North America

1908 was a stellar year for cooperative missionary and ecumenical enterprise. In that year were founded the Home Missions Council, the Council of Women for Home Missions, and the Federal Council of Churches. The Home Missions Council aimed, in the words of its constitution, "to promote fellowship, conference, and cooperation among the Christian organizations doing missionary work in the United States and its dependencies." The Council of Women for Home Missions cherished similar goals, but its members were the women's national home missions boards of the cooperating Protestant bodies. In William King's short History of Home Missions Council, the author observes: "The Council of Women has a more detailed and definite constitution and set of by-laws than has the Home Missions Council. What the women gain in precision, the men make up in flexibility." The precision and flexibility were evidently in sync, since the two groups held their annual meetings jointly for many years, until they merged, in 1940, into the Home Missions Council of North America, which in turn became the Division of Home Missions of the National Council of Churches in 1950. Among the cooperative projects of the two councils were field surveys for home missions work, social service among Native American and migrant worker populations, and meetings planned at the national, regional, and local levels. Books published by the several councils can be located in the stacks through appropriate searches of the library's online catalog.
